

Leaving and Returning to Spiritual Satanism - A Reply

High Priest Hooded Cobra 666

11 November, 2022

Wiz Kid wrote:

I'm back after some time away from here, now I better understand my beliefs, my mind, and my emotional side, it was tedious and agonizing to read the nonsense I commented on here a year and a half ago. I recognize how stupid I was being in every sense of that word, but after I got over my ignorance, I needed to get back here and do something different.

First of all, welcome back. I read your whole reply and could tell it's of value but also that your understanding has grown considerably.

The fact that you read the things you wrote before and saw mistakes, arrogance, foolishness, or anything of the sort, means you are maturing and growing. That is a transformative process, we all go through this again and again.

It's also very good that you are focused on doing something different such as this comment to actually help others evade the same mistakes one might have made.

Wiz Kid wrote:

It's interesting to return and see a post like this one because it was precisely in this sense that I had arrived here for the first time. I understood absolutely nothing and thought I could define everything based on my superficial and artificial concept of things at that time, which was just ridiculous, my mind was quite shallow at that time.

That state of consciousness you describe here is the state of ignorance, which, if not broken by external means, life as a construct designed by the Gods to help people elevate, will tear down forcefully of said construct. That is always unpleasant.

All the time I relate things to JoS and my fellows, it's because of my understanding of the above and to help people circumvent this ignorance which can be dark, deadly and cause much grief.

The above state can be evaded by a little acceptance and allowing yourself to leave back the delusion of knowing when one thing they "know".

Unfortunately, the above is not always the case. For example, one reads things and translates these from the standpoint of ignorance that wants to prove itself to be knowledge, ultimately doing major damage to themselves and delaying their journey.

Wiz Kid wrote:

When I left Joy of Satan, I went through really hard times, a few months of personal and psychological terror that made me see the whole truth of this world clearly, and from what I see here, not many like me return to tell stories, despite being horrible times, they made me evolve spiritually and as an individual.

Many people do that mistake, that they think that by "leaving the Joy of Satan" they will make some sort of self affirmation of their individuality or whatever. This is false, as your individuality is not really limited here.

I was not exempt from this in the beginning either, and I had many recoils and many things I did not want to accept or whatever. All these false approaches do arise out of lack of understanding, lack of study, or lack of spiritual advancement.

Spiritual Satanism is strongly ethical, but it's not forced dogma. It does not tell you to "accept or burn". It gives blocks to advancement.

The path is 50/50 towards the personal and the collective, not 100% collective in which case you have to become a slave of dogma.

So recoiling here is foolish as recoiling is same as doing a major recoiling reaction over many other similar things in life; i.e., pointless. The above has to do with the psychology of the initiate and student rather than with reality in itself.

It's not uncommon that one defends a wrong decision to the end of it, i.e., most people who just have an argument or something or disagree with 1 in 100,000 things, do not understand this as normal or as a pathway to their development, but rather develop a self-defense mechanism that is ignorance-based and denies further internal input.

Generally, when disaster or negative things arise that come at odds and the bill for delusion comes, one might wish that they had listened or at least saw certain guiding information. This information exists in the JoS, but one has to apply it, and acceptance is needed for this process of healing and uplifting to occur.

I hope you didn't hurt yourself a lot through all this, but that aside, it seems this strongly matured you.

Wiz Kid wrote:

After the outbreak, and a long recovery period that exceeded a year, and after everything I've seen during that time, it's easy to come to the conclusion that the gods have always been here for me, to lift my spirit, my mind, my heart, and my body when I fall, that's something the fraudsters can't avoid, nor stop it from being done; for them, I would be completely destroyed by now.

It's very comforting to know that the Gods are here for someone, and to also know however the reality that the Gods are here to see us develop and help ourselves and others as much as we can.

Wiz Kid wrote:

During this time of darkness and darkness, which also brought me more knowledge, I also went through many spiritual and mental experiences that I had never seen before, and I believe that many long-hidden secrets were revealed directly to me by our true gods.

That's how it goes, then one is being tested on the courage to go back and fix, or admit, these errors. If one does not show this, they are choosing the wrong path.

Wiz Kid wrote:

As for the topic of the post, when I got here I was younger, and I assume I tried to appear and I was exhibitionist at times, I tried to pass the image of a spiritually advanced guy, and I disrespected the natural hierarchy that exists within Satanism several times. I ended up being punished here precisely because of this and I agree with the verbal attacks I received.

There is really no point to try to "pass by as an advanced guy" besides likely satisfying a defunct ego. This is a curse and a disaster for others, as a lack of actual proficiency is going to harm them and harm you too.

It's better to take it steady, stay on line, please the Gods in your self-awareness, and move forward with piousness, rather than bullshitting others.

Disrespecting the natural hierarchy is foolish, and those who do this pay a dear price. The same goes for those who disrespect the Gods, who oftentimes can give one many warnings, but these are denied.

As Homer says in the Odyssey, the Gods do send Hermes [wise thought] to help people. If we do not accept that input, we will pay the price down the road.

Now that you understand why others might have disliked it, it's a good time to start getting actually advanced and becoming an actually aware and mature person that can help other people and get helped by them too. That's what has meaning, not the bullshit of trying to pretend someone is something or whatever.

Wiz Kid wrote:

I think this happens in most cases because of immaturity or spiritual fascination, the individual knows one of the countless pleasures of Satanism, and with that, he already feels unbeatable and superior to everyone else, it's a natural attitude of novices and beginners. Something that clearly needs guidance from the most advanced and superior minds here.

The above state is described by many Ancient Philosophers and it's a state related to arrogance when one thinks they know too much, are a spiritual master or something that is backed by nothing at all.

As you too have learned, the "elders" must help the seniors in this momentum, as increased momentum in foolishness can cause ultimate destruction.

Certain people take 1, 10 or even 100 years in the above state of rushed deception. The longer you are in this state of ignorance, the harder will be the fall.

Certain people have fallen from that height that nothing remains of them. If one takes it too far, then it can be unforgiving.

Life brings something at some point, when their delusions of grandeur shatter in front of them, and then one has to correct this delusion, or shatter further and further.

As we are all collectively into a battle against delusion, we must try to guard ourselves and others from it, yet in the end of the day that is a personal battle all of us have to take on an individual level.

Lastly, leaving JoS and coming back is not uncommon. Maybe one needs a few years of actually coming in terms or growing, or disasters, or pleasures, in order to understand the value of the given material and its application.

It's a brave step to return and to know what to do, far braver than just getting in love with ignorance and crushing under it. It is also in accordance to the Gods for us to share our mistakes, fuckups, and failures, as these have major value like success does too.

Often times, a lot of my material and understanding has come from certain adversities or challenges in life, existence, or spirituality, not because of fake perceived success like that of a gangster trapper video clip.

Now it would be a good idea to also share maybe more details in regards to what you learned, maybe saving the lives of a few others who might encounter the same issues.

© Joy of Satan Ministries

www.joyofsatan.org